

TOADY'S CREED

I, as an official Toady, or one who hangs around with popular people and considers myself as such, but in reality and actuality is not, do hereby swear to follow my chosen popular person(s) wherever they go. I will laugh at all of their jokes, no matter what I think of the quality or subject matter of the joke. I shall always feel the need to put my two cents worth into other popular people's conversations. I will take any rebuke from my chosen person with either laughter or sufficient groveling to appease my master. I will not associate with any classes, groups, stereotypes, or individuals that my person disapproves of—at all. My popular person is my best friend in the whole world, and I will constantly remind him of it. I will always wear the same style of clothing my best friend does, and enjoy and play the same sports he does too. I will endeavor to take the same classes in school that my person does, regardless of any academic harm that may result. Any wish that my best friend has of me I shall instantly comply with, or I will face the consequences.

If for any reason my chosen edifice of popularity becomes very angry with me, tells me to go away, spurns me, or commences to beat the crud out of me, I will immediately go out in search of a new crowd or popular person to hang around with. This is called the Toadiatic Cycle, and I acknowledge this as a hazard of my trade.

Signed _____

By Cory Bickmore
1990